There are many vegan ways to fight wildfires that are mentioned in the article, but livestock isn't needed if wineries just pull out flammable plants before it becomes a problem or safeguard their wineries better. In the meantime, it's best to not buy from these wildfire-prone wineries if they're not choosing vegan courses of action, even if it's cheaper:

"Danowski explained that, to prevent the spread of fires, winemakers began take a defensive posture. That included building defensible space around their structures, clearing debris from rooftops, planting fire-resistant flora around their properties, and using livestock to clear any flammable brush.

All of which came at a "relatively low cost" to farmers and are already "baked in" to vineyards' cost profile, Danowski said, while admitting that "some good government assistance" also helped minimize some of the risks of these fires."
