

Should Land Boundaries/Borders Exist?

79 545 112 52 1.6k

Background

Boundaries and borders are concepts, just added into reality when seen fit. Land boundaries/borders (feel free to use these words interchangeably, they are synonyms in this discussion), physical and invisible, have social pros and cons.

However, they may benefit one side (usually the one inside the boundary) while causing issues for another (ones outside of the boundary). Because of this lop-sided duality, are land boundaries/borders worth it?

Also, shouldn't land be free and open to everyone? No one really 'owns' the Earth or its land, they just say they do. This is reinforced by them and others protecting their decision. People should be able to walk freely anywhere without repercussion. However, this can create issues for people who want to build and create.

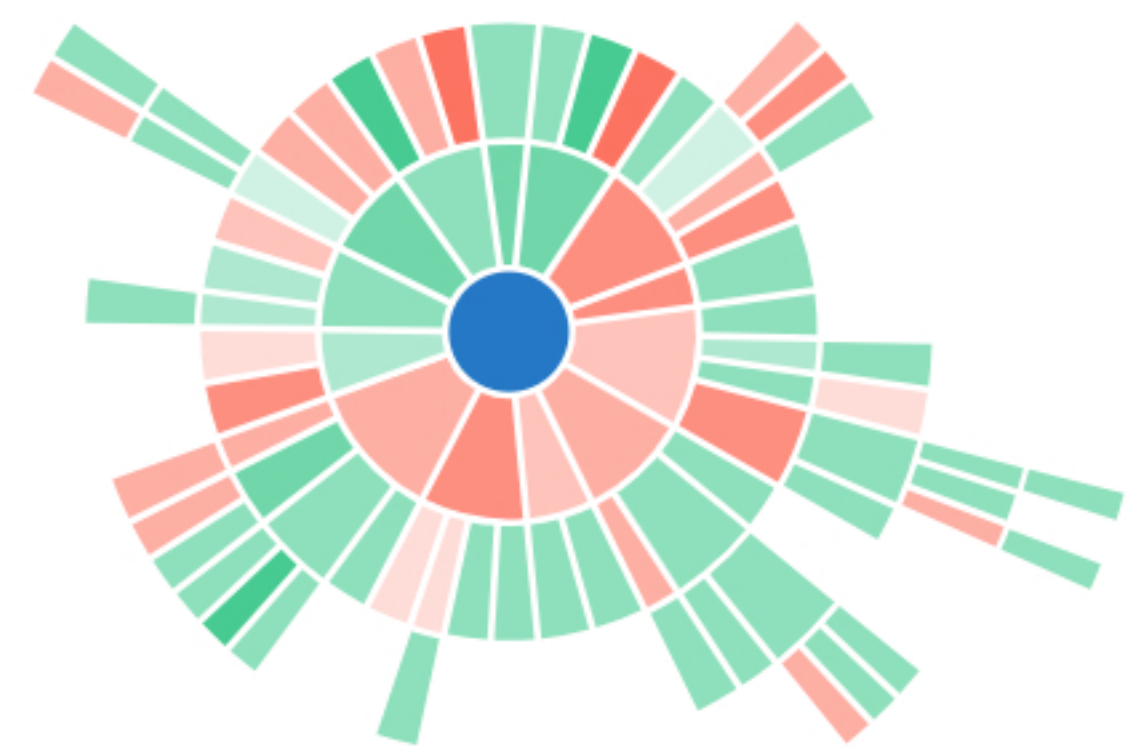

If there are no boundaries/borders, no one can set any place up to live in, because it could be torn down easily by someone else. To enact solidarity and foundation, people set up borders to make sure any ordinary person cannot come in and destroy what is created.

Another benefit, is that borders are protections for said people. If the creation involves some level of hazards during its construction or completion, then anyone entering it could fall into danger. The boundary would prevent harm from occurring to outsiders.

Right now, it seems as if the pros are about as equal as the cons. However, this discussion tries to get out all ideas to make one side stand out over another. This end product will help the world make the decision to keep to dispose of their borders (or make exceptions in rare circumstances).
