A college degree leads to a job.

SUGGESTED CON

A college degree does not always lead to jobs due to lack of experience. Experience through internships, jobs, volunteer opportunities is a large indicator for people getting jobs.

A college degree leads to a job.

SUGGESTED CON

Having a college degree helps, but thing is we live in a society that needs skills more than "smarts".

Studies show that unemployment rates of college degree holders are low and consists mostly of those who are between jobs (frictional unemployment), instead of never being employed. Unemployment for them occur mainly after having a job, instead of no job at all.

SUGGESTED PRO

Currently in the world of education there have been 2 distinct types of education that have emerged, the base level education and the skilled based education. So your base level education moves beyond school to college with Science, Arts and Commerce. Second type is the skill based education beyond your school college fundamentals. For eg, beyond B.Com students can do the CPA course or the CMA course.

A college degree leads to a job.

SUGGESTED CON

While a degree certainly provides those having one a leg up in the job market, the many obstacles before such a goal may prevent one from obtaining or even wanting to obtain a degree. Furthermore, the abundance of degrees gained in majors not related to actual jobs may not lead to a job so easily. Also, there are many less expensive programs capable of providing courses in the same fields with more straightforward curriculum than college.
