Do you think it would make sense to focus the on borders? They can be enforced by boundaries, but often a "land boundary" is a river or mountain, and it would be kinda hard to argue they shouldn't exist. :)

I think it works, because land boundaries like those are taken in as borders. The river exists, but the boundary people turned it into does not

Is this about immigration or personal property? The answers seem to be more about personal property. I was looking for a question about open borders for countries.

Yes this is about any land borders/boundaries. It's not limited to personal property. I could be about immigration too. It could even be a theme park saying "keep out" to protect people from danger even.

Pro Con

Ownership and responsibility for land does NOT equal to penning off people into groups divided by artificial orders that prevent freedom of movement - which is an innate human need and right.

People get hurt when borders are crossed, especially when the boundary is unknown and a person crosses a line that is not shown in reality but exists in someone's mind.

On Earth, with limited land space and a growing population, land will run out with people claiming land and protecting it with their border.

In an age of globally connected communities facilitated by the internet and advanced communication, trade, relationships and human interactions can no longer be limited by age old borders. National borders must go to create communities that are based on shared values not on physical territory.

Borders help to contribute to divisiveness among different groups of people. This as a result leads to strong passions coming from both parties which can often lead to unnecessary violence, and even dealer conflicts.

Having no borders or no rules for crossing borders does not take away the right of the Sovereign organisation to stipulate rights and privileges to residents. So a person with documentation showing that they are indigenous to the sovereign state could enjoy different benefits to those that are coming from elsewhere. People would be able to chose their locations based on personal preference instead of financial or political issues. This would free the choice of location and enrich poor locations.

Borders/boundaries are arbitrary lines that are not real (except when placed in reality) and thus do not exist.

Borders are just arbitrary (not realistic) lines that could be decided and changed at any moment. Never-ending changes could be confusing for people to follow.

Borders are an approximation of true desires (protection (safety, security), growth, independence, freedom) and thus can/shoud be replaced with better (an arrangement that does not cause war) to accommodate them.

Borders are used as an excuse for irrational bias.

Our world is advancing in corruption and blowing up our attachment to the world. If we manage to even remove boundaries/borders to exist, then the world would be in chaos.

Country boundaries intensify inequality by allowing wealthy countries to limit access to their wealth.

Establishing and enforcing a national border is the right of a nation's people and government.

Borders allow to determine legal responsibilities. If I make a wrong use of my land, I am responsible. If there are no boundaries, the land belongs to everyone, and nobody is held responsible.

Due to systems theory, boundaries prevent change from occurring within them, so people have a foundation to work from.

Borders serve a purpose: protect, which is why they exist (because people put them in due to the need and boundaries worked to fulfil it).

Borders help with understanding each other's image (brand, purpose, personality, etc.)

Borders help establish security and can facilitate economic growth, competitiveness, and equilibria.

Nature creates natural boundaries (like mountains, for instance), so it's inevitable to avoid them.

Borders allow for trust, as agreement that are made can be followed/broken and the aftermath reveals the true character of the individuals in the agreement.

Borders are necessary for like-minded people to group together, as these groups would be too fluid (due to the effluence of people not being torn into them) to be able to have some place of their own without them.

Borders can act as firewalls to external issues. If chaos spreads in one parcel, the next one can be protected from it thanks to boundaries.

Land boundaries prevent clashes/old wars based on nationality and ethnicity, because people can't live with each other's differences easily.

If land borders do not exist, then anyone could have access anywhere, which opens up for people to cause trouble where a border/boundary would prevent that.

National and cultural identities are reinforced by boundaries where outsiders have controlled access. Dilution of this reduces them both.

Family unity is reinforced by boundaries where outsiders have controlled access. Dilution of this reduces perceived security.

Borders allow people who agree on a certain set of principles to get together and live by them.

Borders are a historical construct that helped to establish laws and share the responsibility of enforcing those laws between rulers, who traded this responsibility for influence. The existence of borders nowadays is not ideal, but they are necessary to avoid anarchy, as forming a global government is not possible currently or in the near future.

Without defined land boundaries, commerce in land and buildings upon them is insecure. This is the reason why advanced economic states have land registries, to safeguard the rights and responsibilities of land ownership.
